About James Quigley and Model Citizen Press

The first time Model Citizen Press founder James Quigley pulled a print on a tabletop press in 2012, he knew he was hooked. The definitive impact of the type into the paper, the smell of the ink, the clanking of vintage machinery...in letterpress, he had found what he needed to do. In 2013, after 20+ years as an in-house graphic designer for a large international organization in Washington, D.C., James left his desk job to establish Model Citizen Press. Now he spends his days thinking in pica, mixing ink, and printing distinctive, mostly modern designs on antique technology. His current weapons of choice are a 1926 Chandler & Price Jobbing Press and a 1948 Vandercook 4T.

James holds an MFA in Graphic Design from the Savannah College of Art and Design. When he is not making his own cards and coasters for Model Citizen Press, he enjoys teaching letterpress printing at a community arts center in suburban D.C., watching others find delight in pulling their first print. A native Nebraskan, James is currently based in Maryland, but will always be a Midwesterner at heart.

James founded Model Citizen Press with the philosophy of “real sentiment, no foofoo,” reflecting his humor, sincerity, down-to-earth nature, and the fact that he’s a guy. (Read: no pastels.) From smart and quirky—and sometimes downright subversive—to poignant and heartfelt, MCP’s cards, prints, coasters, and other hand-crafted pieces are made with painstaking attention to detail on high-quality paper stock—they feel as good as they look.
